- Needs to look for WR cues
- Gets lost at top of route
- Ball skills are only okay
- Doesn't have a press at line
- Doesn't attack with consistency
- Has trouble with quickness

Jalen Ramsey is an incredibly gifted athlete at a position where athleticism is a premium. That, along with his versatility and his effort on the field, makes him the top corner prospect in this draft. That isn't to say he's without warts. Ramsey struggled at times to stay with receivers this past season when he transitioned to the perimeter of the Seminoles defense. He has trouble with quick receivers that can stem the top of their route and change directions quickly. It seems to be more a technique problem with Ramsey, who is very fast and agile himself. He's played three positions in his time at FSU, making it hard for him to truly lock down and learn one position. He'll be asked to be a lock down corner at the next level and at 6'1" 202, he's got the size, strength and speed to do it. Right now he's actually better in zone coverage where he can read and then break on the ball. The bottom line is that he's got all the tools to be an elite corner. Teams will be lining up to draft him. Top 5 pick worthy of the draft position.
