- Gets shut out by bigger receivers on slant routes
- Slow to stop and drive on ball

Johnathan Jones doesn't have the size, but he has the speed and agility to make plays in the NFL. He might not be a full time starter, but he's the quick, sticky style corner who could play in the slot in nickel situations. While he's not a great tackler and he doesn't bring much size to the position, he's a good all-around corner to contribute for any team. Teams threw away from him this past year, which caused a productivity drop. He was also misused as a zone corner in Auburn's scheme. While he showed the ability to play the position, his skill set lends itself to the slot. Very important contributor for some team who will get overlooked on draft day.
