Mackensie Alexander might turn out to be the best man cover corner in this draft class. He's fast, has lightning quick feet and excels at press coverage at the line. There are times when he knows the route before the receiver runs it and beats him to the spot. By that, it's clear that he not only has the talent, but the dedication in the film room, to be a great player. He's a fiery player and plays with a great deal of confidence. As a redshirt sophomore, he simply needs to become more consistent in his technique. As with many ultra-talented players, he can rely on his speed instead of his technique to make plays. Once he learns to play with more consistency and make plays on the ball, he will be a top tier starter on the outside.
