Summary: Nico Siragusa is a redshirt senior guard prospect from San Diego State who was named to the AP All-American Third Team this past season. Siragusa had offers out of high school to larger schools, but chose to stay close to his family in San Diego. Siragusa is a burly, strong guard prospect with a massive upper body and a svelte lower body. The San Diego native is a good athlete, with good hip flexibility and good pop to his game. He doesn't have great long speed to get out in front of plays or chase down linebackers, but he's quick in the short area and shows an ability to get to the 2nd level when asked. His technique is solid, starting with a good pad level and making strong contact with short choppy steps in the running game. At times he gets too high and loses leverage and therefore power, but he's naturally strong and makes up for it. However this didn't allow him to dominate at the Division II level as consistently as one would hope. In pass protection, he's alert and anchors well vs bull rushers. He misses some stunts and blitzes and has some mental lapses but overall he's a solid pass protector. Siragusa will be a quality swing guard at the next level, having just enough speed and athleticism to play on the left and enough power to play on the right. He'll be a starter with the possibility of being an occasional pro bowler. Teams should target Siragusa in the 3rd round and will be the start of the 2nd wave of interior linemen off the board.
