PROS

- Athletic guard with great feet
- Has played inside and outside at Georgia
- Silky smooth feet, rarely out of position
- Good arm length for height
- Good hand placement and hand fighting
- Core strength seems solid, never off balance
- Great hip flexibility, can get low and fire out
- Mature player with great technique
- Nasty blocker who will go for knockout
- Athletic enough to get out to 2nd level and hit

CONS

- Doesn't have the length for tackle, kick inside
- Top heavy, doesn't carry thickness in lower half
- May not have the anchor vs bull rushes inside
- Struggles vs longer defenders
- Lacks true power to overwhelm

SUMMARY

It's cliché to say, but Georgia senior Isaiah Wynn is just a football player. He's not the strongest player without the body type that you would like ideally from an offensive lineman, and he's not as tall or long as you would like, but he's a first round pick regardless. Those are really the knocks against Wynn. His body type does not lend to one position in the NFL because he plays like a left tackle, with great feet, balance and pass blocking skills. He's a silky smooth operator who can get in front of plays and doesn't usually miss on blocks at the second level. He's smart, mature and versatile in what he can do. He's a good run blocker who despite his lack of lower body power, is a mauler who effectively creates space in the running game. He might not have the raw power to play guard for some teams, but he's strong and plays with great leverage. Despite his lack of height, he has long arms for his frame and falls within the acceptable range for blockers. He does struggle versus longer armed defenders, but it takes a special talent to get the best of Wynn most times. Teams that are looking for an athletic interior offensive lineman who can run, pull and execute combo blocks, an who has the feet to be an outstanding pass blocker. Wynn is your guy. Lack of high end athletic traits and true position will knock him down in the first round but he is worthy of a Day 1 pick. Will be a steal in the 2nd round.

*Wynn did not participate at the Combine or the Georgia Pro day while recovering from a torn shoulder labrum that he played with at the end of the season.
