SUMMARY

Ignore all the 'talk' in draft season around Josh Rosen. It's generally inane and doesn't add up to much in the end. UCLA junior quarterback Josh Rosen is a smart, well-schooled, NFL ready player with plenty of arm to make NFL throws. When it comes to NFL readiness, Rosen is the picture of what an NFL quarterback is. He has good size, with a strong enough arm and is well-schooled in the fundamentals of the position. His footwork, stride length, release and delivery are all incredibly impressive. Rosen completed 60% of his passes in college for nearly 10,000 yards and 59 touchdowns in three seasons with the Bruins with a touchdown to interception ratio of better than 2-1. He was also the first true freshman to ever start at quarterback for UCLA. Rosen shows very good football intelligence, running an NFL scheme with play action fakes, as well as three, five and seven step drops. He's comfortable in the pocket and can sidestep rushers while keeping his eyes down the field and delivers the ball accurately from multiple platforms. Rosen is also very good at reading a defense pre-snap and recognizing matchups that he wants to take advantage of. His anticipation, eye discipline, and accuracy make him a franchise quarterback candidate. He is also tough. While the Manhattan Beach native does have a concerning injury history, he also played through some nasty hits. His offensive line this past season was dreadful and he wasn't given many game-breaking options in his skill positions. There is a question as to how strong of an arm Rosen has. With a clean pocket and room to step into his throws, his arm is strong enough to make every throw you could ask of him. The issue is that he can't do that when rushed or flushed from the pocket. His 'dynamic' qualities outside of the pocket are average at best. He also make some poor decisions when stressed. He'll throw into tight windows while on the run, or try to fit a ball into a window that he simply doesn't have the arm talent to deliver. Despite that, Rosen is a first round pick and an NFL ready starter. Great franchise quarterback prospect.
